

The Louvre Museum

Since the end of the 12th century, the Louvre buildings have dominated the heart of Paris. Over time, the erstwhile fortress became the residence of the Kings of France and later a museum in 1793. Today the Louvre displays works of Western art, from the Middle Ages to 1848, ancient civilisations and the Islamic world.

Musée Eugène Delacroix

The Musée Eugène Delacroix is located within the flat and workshop where Delacroix lived and worked from December 1857 onwards. It became part of the Musée du Louvre in 2004 and houses a series of collections related to the French painter, such as paintings, pastels, drawings, lithographs and a large number of letters and mementos. A site of remembrance – Eugène Delacroix died here on 13 August 1863 – the museum is also an intimate place where one can feel the artist's creative spirit. The workshop was built at the painter's request and its large glass facade overlooking over the garden is decorated with casts of ancient works. The garden's recent renovation was sponsored by Mr. Kinoshita and offers visitors a haven of peace and calm in the centre of Paris.

largest and oldest public garden in Paris. Intimately connected to the history of the Louvre, which transformed from a castle to a palace and finally a museum, the garden has also undergone several vicissitudes, from private garden to ornamental garden to vegetable garden during wartime. In 2005, it became part of the public institution of the Musée du Louvre. With its landscape art, beautiful views and sculptures, it naturally complements the Palace and fits in well with the vast palatial complex designed by the Kings of France. Take a leisurely stroll along an original path through the site's historic area: the Grand Couvert groves, the several finely worked gates and also the Garden of Napoleon III, among 800 replanted trees, lawns and numerous flowerbeds.
